

Will Inflation Hurt Stock Returns? Not Necessarily.

STOCKS VS. INFLATION

Investors may wonder whether stock returns will suffer if inflation keeps rising. But a look at equity performance in the past three decades does not show any reliable connection between periods of high (or low) inflation and US stock returns.

- While 2022 saw high inflation and poor stock returns, there have been other periods with high inflation and strong stock market performance.
- Twenty-two of the past 30 years saw positive stock returns even after adjusting for the impact of inflation.
- Over the period charted, the S&P 500 posted an annualized compound return of 7.0% after adjusting for inflation.

History shows that stocks tend to outpace inflation over time—a valuable reminder for investors concerned about rising prices.

Real returns illustrate the effect of inflation on an investment return and are calculated using the following method: $[(1 + \text{nominal return of index over time period}) / (1 + \text{inflation rate})] - 1$.
